This quote clearly refers to topics such as death, destruction and innocence. It makes me feel sad because it seems love as something dangerous and painful, different from the typical concept of love that we all have. It illustrates stereotypes over women, such as being weak or fragile. This can be related to the Freudian concept of repression, defined by “the idea to which the intolerable wish is attached has been a failure” (Freud 2215) as “there soon become attached the same feelings of unpleasantness which it was hoped had been saved by the repression.” (Freud 2215) as the love experience for this woman is clearly too painful. However is never going to leave her mind, instead is going to be founded in her deepest memories, destroying her emotions and influencing her thoughts, ideas, and behaviors, becoming unaware of its existence
