

A Deportation in the United States can occur when an immigrant fails to comply with the laws of the country such as illegal entry, this law currently does not have any exception not either if the deported person is a minor. The lawyers assigned to these cases say they have had to perform last-minute legal maneuvers to try to prevent deportations from happening and that one of the most difficult frontiers is language. As a fact, a child is unprepared to be presented and defend itself in a court and this success turns worst when the only hope they have to be protected is a lawyer who talks a completely different language than them. Our current president says "This is a country where we speak English. It's English. You have to speak English!" (Donald Trump 2016 US presidential campaign.) Now try to explain this statement to a child who is just starting to face the cruelty of the world and is living a language weapon that is not allowing him to communicate with his lawyer and no one, not even our president, is going to take care of his rights.